Still desperate as were the odds, they thought of nothing has expedients to escape, which they hoped to effect on some stormy night, when the sentinels might seek the shelter of their boxes, or the entrance porches of the prison doors. At length they met with a better friend than the elements, in the person of a cockney sentine - an elegant extraft from Newgate - who was marvel-lously fond of beer, or, in their thereof, and while he was sporing in a door-way the prisoners, who were in what is called the second casement, removed a har their window, and descended inside the outer wall, which surrounded the citadel like a shell. As the sentinel was perfectly oblivious, they easily mounted the wall on the inside; and the only difficulty was to get down, its exterior height being some thirty feet. They commenced descending by the flag-staff, but their weight made it creak so much that they feared it would alarm the sentinels, and they concluded to drop down, in doing which they received several severe bruises,
